

To most people especially the westernised, it's a closed book that Africanism has left women in a mean system. Only few African village women still, really realise the meanness of it. Born in a village in one of the sub-Saharan African countries, Mary was one of the village girls bold to run away from the traditions and cultures of African tribes that devalued women to the city where western civilization has given it an advancement. She went through very trying and herculean tasks where faith, courage, brilliance and commitment as her fortes led her to where she desired. Unlike Mary, many women for the sake of material acquisitions, sell their right most times out of ignorance for what they believe and deserve as human beings with the pride of the greedy. Is this book an intriguingly passionate tale of a girl? Can one also say it's a gothic story? Rose Mary by Vincent Bin Martin is, in my opinion, a common but gripping blend of these genres. The story is fiction as names of most characters and incidences are the author's imagination yet it's an epic with re-occurrences that are characteristics in women's life – realities and convincing. It is a fascinating tale of rural life as lived by Africans far away from the cities in Africa engulfed in western civilization that signifies the triumph of modernism over traditionalism. The main character, Mary, is born in a village is exposed to the devaluing impact the rural way of life has on women. The tradition as practiced in the village makes women abscond to the city where they find room to exert rights and equality with men. However, the right to freedom and equality goes on to give women the power and the mind to express vile, villainy and viciousness. Mary and her cousin are carried away by the new phase of a friend who like many women run to the city for what they crave unaware of the fact that unlike her cousin she cannot indulge in the vile that are common with women. Undoubtedly, Mrs. Man, a woman who comes across Mary in her travails to survive after she runs away a second time, this time from a practise common with women which she cannot abhor, the professor who marries her are characters who indicate that impiety or goodwill is either way; from man or woman – “these ones are full of goodwill. The story is impressively real. It's what goes on day in day out in humanity; traditionalism or modernism. It's highly recommended for both sexes to realise their equality as far existentialism is concerned. By the end of the book you realise that women are as equal as men.
